Not illustrated. 1901 Excerpt: .If made after the sale has been completed, the warranty is void for want of consideration. A bought a bicycle from B, a dealer. After the price had been paid, and when A was leaving, he asked if there was a warrant on the machine, and was told by B that he would warrant it for a year. This is of no value for lack of consideration. 323. Kinds.--Warranties are either expressed or implied, and in reference to the thing warranted, are either of title or of quality. 324. Warranty of Quality.--Whether a statement made at the time of sale will amount to an express warranty or not depends, as we have said, upon the circumstances of each case. If there was a serious defect covered by the seller's statement, and one peculiarly within his knowledge, and not open to the buyer's inspection, it will have great weight in deciding his statement to be a warranty. But it must be remembered that Caveat Emptor is the general rule and that these are only exceptions or modification of it. 325. When Warranty of Futility Is Implied.--When the buyer is not permitted to inspect the goods, or where inspection from the nature of the case is impossible, the rule of Caveat Emptor does not apply, and a warranty is implied. This is the case when goods are sold by sample or description. When goods are ordered for a particular purpose, and the buyer must necessarily rely...
